Incorrect naming of events leads to false conclusions in any languages, which can lead to a split Internet

According to various estimates, about 45 million people in the world speak Ukrainian, and it is one of the second ten most widely spoken languages in the world

Multistakeholderism – key principle of Internet governance, requiring joint management of Internet resources by governments, business and the civil society in their respective roles

- functions as a linguistic borrowing
- has no authentic equivalent which leads to conglomeration and confusion
- requires standardization

Internet governance (IG) – the rules, norms, mechanisms, and organizations through which the global Internet community's many stakeholders work together to shape the evolution and use of the Internet

- there are more than 5 ways of translating this term
- deciding on one way of interpreting the term and adding it to the official glossary will make it simpler to complete further translation

Ransomware attack – a form of malware in which the attacker disables or disrupts a victim's computer and demands payment to undo the damage

- mislabeled as a virus or named virus-extortioner
- cannot be used as borrowing in the interpreted text because it will not convey its full meaning

Public interest – refers to parts of the Internet that can be considered as a global public good essential for the welfare or well-being of the general public

- initially, this term has to show how beneficial and crucial for society is something
- most interpreters use a literal translation approach here, but it does not sound accurate enough

Multiculturalism is the key to fruitful work of the ICANN community:

- raise the awareness of the secure Internet
- engage people with different cultural and academic backgrounds in ensuring a stable and fast Internet since those whose first language is not English are currently excluded from experiencing the full benefits of the Internet
